Start with No, by negotiation coach Jim Camp, is a tenaciously contrarian guide to the art and science of give-and-take that proposes a viable alternative for today's prevailing "win-win" approach. Beginning with an inverse premise--that having the right to say "no" and veto any agreement is actually the key to favorably concluding the various deals and transactions we face every day--Camp's procedure counters the common emotion-based urge to compromise ("a defeatist mind-set from the first ...

A "Yes" at the beginning of a negotiation is not too good an idea as things still change over the course of time. A "Maybe" on the other hand will drive the other side crazy, but it will drag negotiations out for a long period, which wastes valuable time and money. A "No" on the other hand makes the other side think.

Salary negotiation is an essential part of any job interview process. This is especially true for women as we work to close the gender wage gap in New York State, leading the way for the rest of the nation. Why is it so important? Because if women start out making less than their male counterparts, the difference compounds over time.
